

To the FCC:

This is very simple -- without this law, the tool that has become the most important one for communication in the world will become the playground of corporations to make up whatever rules they wish. Acting as if they won't take full advantage of this ignores the history of the ISPs themselves. As some of these providers also control television service, it would set them up to be the most powerful force in the country by far. They need to move at the speed of consumerism, not by the speed of their profit margin -- the demands of the consumer stay in-step with the progression of technology, and the ISPs need to keep up with the consumer. Without net neutrality, there will be no sense of urgency for them to do so, and they already lag behind some of the world in the service they provide in the most technologically advanced nation in the world. They already possess the nail -- not restoring net neutrality would give them the hammer.
