

7522903153.txt

Corporations are not evil in themselves. They provide jobs. They provide services. Without corporations, we would not be the competitive, economic powerhouse that we are today. But corporations are about the bottom dollar. They are not about life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, nor do they have the best interests of our country's citizens in mind. We the American people have put in place safeguards in order to balance the good that corporations provide with the pitfalls (monopolies, abuses of influence, etc.). Why would the FCC and the United States Congress be an advocate for ending net neutrality - for giving large corporations a competitive advantage in broadband speeds? Aren't large corporations competitive enough? The majority of Americans do not have the ability to choose between ISPs. So why would we now give these cable monopolies the ability to create other monopolies online? Why would our United States Congress and our Federal Communications Commission be in favor of ending net neutrality? Doing so does not benefit the American people, nor does it benefit our long-held ideas of equality, transparency, and fair competition.