

7522908574.txt

A two-tiered system of data delivery is inherently unjust. The FCC must reclassify internet carriage as a "telecommunications service," which would subject online communications to common carrier protections. The open Internet rules were designed to prevent internet service providers from blocking or slowing users' connections to online content. Without net neutrality, ISPs will be able to block content and speech they don't like and prioritize data delivery.